Building Great Bridges

Do you foster teamwork or build barriers at work?

All bridge building requires a main builder — someone aware of and guiding the process. In the case of the famous Golden Gate Bridge we give credit to Joseph Baerman Strauss, the bridge builder who met a challenge that others refused to undertake. Something similar can happen with working relationships on the job. When the right person takes the lead in establishing relational bridges to other workers or departments a beautiful work of art may result. Expert bridge building, however, takes time and experience. Some prefer not to build at all.

Why think “it’s all about me”?

Can you ever legitimately say, “it’s all about me”? It depends. Ultimately, “it’s not all about you.” On the other hand, we ultimately make our own choices. At work, you can often do something to make things better — to contribute to a pleasant environment.

What do we mean? Someone once wrote that if you expect others to change it usually means we have to change ourselves.

An example? Anyone can take the first step and become more considerate of others, more hard working, or even have a cleaner work area.

Someone will always notice our change and perhaps also start to do things differently. But, what happens if no one makes an effort?
