

The Pallet

Do you need to fail to win?
Can failure set you up to succeed?

Cool name ... unrealistic expectations. Can't Fail? Really? Failure happens everywhere, everyday, at some level. In some cases it happens despite our best efforts and/or on account of someone else's below average performance. We try not to fail and even strangely try to fail in some cases. But, when failure occurs, what can we do? First, don't listen to friends who want you to blame everyone else without looking at your own part in the failure. ("It's his/her/their fault!") Rather, look for and admit your own role in the error and learn from it. Then, listen to friends who want to encourage you to try again. Perhaps lack of good advice and support led to failure in the first place. Finally, try again!

Employee of the Month

How do you contribute to the success of your fellow workers? Do you enjoy or envy other employees who succeed at their work? Do you rejoice with the worker who wins the 'employee of the month' parking spot?

Many of us have seen TV shows or movies where an evil employee tries to take credit for another's good work or contributions. In the end the boss usually finds out and the good employee wins a promotion ... or something.

But what would happen if every employee tried to contribute to the success of everyone else? Your company would prosper as a whole. And ... you just might get that employee of the month parking spot ... or something!
